Research in Social Forestry at Auburn University

Over the past 15 years, anthropologists, rural sociologists, and political scientists have been actively involved in the examination of forestry and related issues in Alabama, the South, and beyond. To these efforts must be included those of our colleagues in Forestry Economics, whose program has a far longer history (not included here).

Research on social aspects of forestry at Auburn can be dated from the hiring of John Bliss by the School of Forestry. John is now at Oregon State University. A team of researchers involving Bliss, Conner Bailey (Rural Sociology), Larry Teeter (Forest Economics), and Glenn Howze (Rural Sociology) won a series of grants, attracted good students, and began the systematic examination of the forest products industry of Alabama and the South.

When Bliss left, Mark Dubois, a forester from the School of Forestry, became engaged in our efforts and has dedicated a significant portion of his efforts to collaborating with social scientists. Ben Cashore, a political scientist now at Yale University, added a strong international dimension to the program during his all-too-brief stay at Auburn.

Over the last several years John Schelhas, an anthropologist with the USDA Forest Service, has been instrumental in building a consortium of social scientists in Alabama working on forestry issues. This consortium includes colleagues at Alabama A&M University and Tuskegee University.

Anthropologist Josh McDaniel worked at the School of Forestry & Wildlife Sciences for approximately three years and encouraged Kelly Alley, an anthropologist in Liberal Arts, to become involved in forestry research.

In short, a number of people have contributed over the past 15 years to expanding discussions of forestry in Alabama and beyond. This report focuses on accomplishments by faculty and students from Auburn University; the listing would be even greater if we were to include our colleagues at Tuskegee and Alabama A&M.
